

ABSTRACT

A novel method for assessing the risk of a cardiovascular event is provided. The concentration of 11-dehydro thromboxane in a urine sample is measured and compared to a set of standardized quartile concentrations. A concentration of urinary 11-dehydro thromboxane that falls within the fourth quartile is indicative of a greatly increased risk of a recurrent cardiovascular event.